ACTIVITY 1

Read one sentence (the sentence that has the bold underline text) and record repeating the sentence.

As far as uses today, robots provide a variety of everyday and peculiar solutions for problems. They can accommodate us in so many ways and have already assimilated themselves into society. Their uses can be divided into two categories: a job which a robot can do better than a human, and a job which is dangerous for a human.

Read one sentence (the sentence that has the bold underline text) and record repeating the sentence.

Even without bad programming, a robot, especially one moving freely in a human environment, is susceptible to creating danger to humans due to its large mass, lack of rational thought, and the possibility of spontaneous malfunctioning. A robot falling on someone or running into someone could cause a lot of damage to the victim.

Read one sentence (the sentence that has the bold underline text) and record repeating the sentence.

The primary fear is that the robots' intelligence and ability to act could exceed that of humans, and that they could become so keenly intelligent that they might develop a desire to take over the human race. If a robot should become competent enough and chooses to assert this power one day, it would be trouble for humans. It is a problem that needs to be pondered, but many scientists are eloquent in their defense of continuing their development.

Read one sentence (the sentence that has the bold underline text) and record repeating the sentence.

Designing and programming robots to be intrinsically safe is one of the great challenges motivated researchers face today, and it leaves many perplexed. Many queries about robots are left unanswered. But rest assured, once their safe use is guaranteed, a boisterous and buoyant welcoming will be heard.

Zebras

Zebras are one of the most intriguing animals. Originally found in Africa, they are known for their black and white stripes that cover their body. The reason for the striped pattern is for camouflage. With vertical stripes, zebras can hide in the long grass.

Of course this may seem useless since grass is green, but lions are color blind and happen to be the zebra's primary predator. A herd of zebras appears as one large animal to intimidate possible predators, but if a lion gets hold of a zebra, there is no grappling its way out of the lion's grip. Zebras have done well in terms of persevering through the tough African wilderness.

NEXT >>

Among the species of zebras are Plains Zebras, Mountain Zebras, and Grevy's Zebras. Plains Zebras are the most common and have many subspecies. Mountain Zebras have a sleek coat with a white belly and narrower stripes than the Plains Zebras.

Grevy's Zebras are the largest kind, looking almost like a mule. It is the rarest species of zebra and is considered endangered. Experts speculate that it may not exist before too long, unlike the other species that promise to have an indefinite existence. To survive, the Grevy's Zebras must cope with the dangerous environment of lions hunting for it.

To most, the names are just garbled, rambling, irrelevant words that are incoherent. Only an expert could decipher them; to everyone else they are incomprehensible.

Even if you are not illiterate or the writing of words is illegible, you would probably have a tough time. For example, zebras are of the equidae family and equus genus. It takes a persistent student to figure out all the scientific terms.

There have been many attempts to train zebras for riding since they have better resistance than horses to African diseases. However, most of these attempts failed due to the zebra's unpredictable nature and tendency to panic under stress. Because of this, zebra-mules or zebroids (crosses between any species of zebra and a horse, pony, or donkey) are preferred over pure-bred zebras.
